Erica Wessmann's recent work Changing Title questions the traditional definition of a wall by creating a form that is cut, split, suspended, lighted, and expressed as an undulating structure in flux. Its wave-like form rolls and bulges and is intended to fill an exhibition space almost entirely. Blue light emanates from within the structure, literally highlighting the cuts and fluctuations in the surface. The steady light emits a TV-like glow that appears to alter in relation to the sun and streetlight, reflections of passersby, and modulations within the sculptural form. There is no fixed point of view into the unusual space that Ms. Wessmann has articulated.
